PARENTING CORNER

Parent-teacher partnership can play significant role in child's education

An effective parent-teacher partnership can make a significant difference in your child's education, and the start of a new semester is an ideal time to refocus this partnership.

A parent's well-planned involvement in a child's education can make a big difference. It is important to approach each parent-teacher conference as an opportunity to refine your child's individual learning plan and to make sure the roles of teacher, student and parents are clear, specific and designed to bring out the best in your child.

Here are some practical suggestions to make the conference as productive as your child needs it to be:

- 1. Don't take school for granted. Talk to your child about his or her experiences on a daily basis. Ask what your child likes and doesn't like about school, and what is and what isn't challenging. Parents who understand school as their child experiences it are in a much better position to coach, encourage or intervene properly.
- 2. Discuss your questions and concerns with your spouse/ child's guardians a week before the parent-teacher conference. Identify the information you wish to impart to the teacher. Make notes to remind you of key points to cover during the actual conference. Review reports and check your files from previous conferences to see if they remind you of important topics you may have missed. Be clear in your own mind about your child's strengths, weaknesses and appropriate goals. Identify both challenges and the gains your child seems to be making as a student and as a social person.
- 3. Develop a team approach with the teacher. Listen to the teacher share perceptions before raising your concerns. Identify areas of agreement and ask clarifying questions about others. Paraphrase frequently and summarize periodically to ensure clarity and mutual agreement on key points.

Parents who utilize these simple strategies significantly will increase the chances that school will be the successful experience they want for their children.
